Badass introduction.

What you are about to read is one seriously fucking important book. Every single, g-d damn word.

Because Linux is badass. Seriously badass. We're talking Sylvester Stalone and Chuck Norris had their genes combined to create a clone baby. And that baby kicked a football to the moon. And then the moon fucking exploded. Then Firefly season 2 started airing on HBO – and it was even better than the first season.

This is a book about that. About how, and why, Linux achieves such stellar levels of badassery.

Don't know what Linux is? Fuck you. This book isn't for you. Stop reading right now and go buy a book about the history of tampons; you can't handle this book. How the shit did you even manage to find this book?

Know what Linux is but don't think it's baddass?

... Ah, fuck it. Here's a flowchart to cover who should read this book. Because flowcharts are badass and I am a lazy bastard.

There. Now that we have that all cleared up, let us continue...

Badass by comparison.

In order to declare something to be officially fucking badass, we must first create a baseline from which we can measure. So let's take a look at all the other piece of shit operating systems out there to see if any of them are badass or not.

Let's start with an exercise. Stand up, wherever you are, and say the following:

“OH SNAP! Did you see that copy of Windows that he's running on that PC over there? That's just like the one my Aunt Tabitha uses! Badass! I am blown away by how homogeneously hardcore that is!”

Now take note of the fact that you feel like a retard for just saying that. In fact, this is the first time, in human history, that those words have been put together in that order. And it caused three of my finger to spontaneously erupt into flames while I typed them out.

“But, what about a Mac? Those are pretty cool!” I hear some of you saying.

No. No they are not. And you are a bad person for having said so. Here. Let me help you out with a flowchart.

But why? Why are those other systems such steaming piles of donkey crap when compared with the badass – and minty fresh – awesomeness of Linux? Here's a few examples to make those of you, that don't use Linux, feel bad about your life choices.

“It just works”? Fuck that!
